Post neoliberal governance for sustainable global growth and development 209

Gore also includes in the PWC the “Southern consensus” which has some impact on policy. This is an alliance between Latin American structuralists and Asian developmentalists, who recognize that history and structural environment make a good deal of difference to development. Sequencing of structural changes is important, and state-business linkages to direct long-term productive capital through industry policy, provision of infrastructure and innovation, and regional cooperation and integration. This represents a form of strategic governance where national economies link to regional and global structures and commodity chains, and where those networks inform governance issues and policies. Such policies look to long-term trends and evolutionary transformation in global and regional economies.

The new consensus—of whatever variety—is also associated with a recognition of the role of institutions and trust in the development process. The World Bank, in particular, has championed the notion that institution building is both a pre- and co-requisite for development and that structures of trust and association are essential for markets and other institutions to operate effectively. It is not simply a question of property rights, but
